Teaching Philosophy

Learning starts with trust. Honesty builds trust. Teaching that fosters and reinforces trust – in words and deeds – is the beginning of high-impact learning. My teaching philosophy applies to every class taught and informs the methods used based on a lifetime of learning as a successful business owner, publisher and editor.

Field reporting is incorporated into all my journalism writing courses to give students skills and professional clips necessary for a journalism career. Lectures define elements of media style writing, editing and ethics. Field reporting underscores the weight and responsibility of a journalist. Lectures on professional integrity and best practices are experienced first-hand interviewing experts. The reporting process of advance topic research, conducting interviews and learning to accurately synthesize information is a working model of time management, problem solving and critical thinking to achieve a goal. Adhering to professional standards and ethics enables classroom work to be published, often for the first time for students.

A student's first byline is an indelible learning moment and highly motivating for most students to continue to improve. Knowing classwork is fact-checked and may be published compels honesty and builds a practice of journalism integrity.
