

RESI Graduate Student Small Research Grants Required Signatures for Application

RESI annually funds a number of Graduate Student Small Research Grants at up to $1,000 each. If a fellowship is awarded, the funds will be transferred to the student’s home department as a research bursary.

To be eligible, applicants must be full-time graduate students in good standing at Texas A&M University. Students may apply for both the RESI-Cantú Graduate Research Fellowships and Graduate Small Research Grants; but if a student is offered both, the student may only accept one or the other. If a student applying for the Graduate Student Small Research Grants has previously had a project funded through another RESI program, they must have completed all requirements of that program, including reporting. Students are expected to work closely with their advisors on a project description, rationale for the grant, and budget. The budget might include (but not be limited to) fieldwork, travel to archives, research materials, data sets, survey instruments, and participant incentives. The fellowship is not intended solely as a small grant to attend a conference, although proposals that include (or will lead to) presentations at conferences and workshops are strongly encouraged. The budget may not include stipend/salary, publication support, or tuition of any sort. The primary outcome should be a definable portion of the doctoral dissertation, master’s thesis, or a major publication.

Students must have both the Director of Graduate Studies’ and the Department Chair’s approval to be nominated. Students may receive the Graduate Student Small Research Grant once every two years.
